I am adherent to the third way. Math is a human-built interface to objective structure. We invent the symbols and axioms; we discover which structures those inventions latch onto in the world. Think of it as reverse-engineering the universe's API: we design clients, then find which endpoints actually respond. What's real (mathematically and physically) are relations, information and structure. Math is the toolkit for possible information structures. The world is a system for constrained information processing within stable structures. Physics is our mathematical description of the world using a subset of possible mathematics that survives reality's constraints and observed behaviour. Given the highly structured nature of the world and the inter connectedness of mathematics it is therefore no surprise that mathematics seemingly unrelated to the physical universe can sometimes catapult into relevance as our understanding of physics advances. A perfect example being Riemannian geometry.
